[Continued from first page.] fifteen inches in length. This is not, perhaps, that poetry of fishing where there is deep water all around and the fish may be killed by the reel, with an occasional touch of the tip of the rod, but it is more exciting and requires more skill and dexterity. The mismow has passed through the battle uninjured and once more is cast into the pool. Again the float disappears, and a strike fastens the book in the jaws of a fish Again the float disappears, and a fish fastens the book in the jaws of a fish and the same fight is fought over again. It ends as before, and after a battle royal the bass is landed. A fresh minnow is impaled and a third and a fourth bass are added to the creel. Then comes the event. Having struck his fifth fish it proved to be a fighter. It tried every stratagem known to the fluny tribe to shake itself free from the stinging steel in its jaw. It flew up the river, then down. It leaped from the water and tried to shake the book from its mouth. It doubled back toward the tree. Sambbed in that direction it darted for deep water again, rection it darted for deep water again, and fly toward the part of at least one of the law, on the part of at least one of the law, or the law or the law or the law or t the fisherman's hand; the strain was immense; it seemed to check the fish and Will thought it was giving to the steady tension, but it seemed that it had merely steadied itself for a supreme effort; it churned that top of the water as it took a new start, and—the rod snapped in two about five feet from the tip. Here an amateur would have been lost, but William is a veteran. He seized the line and succeeded in recovering the five-foot tip of the rod, just as it was about to disappear under the hoat, and as good luck would have been lost, and as good luck would have lost the first when he stady case of the Wood law was but a means to an end, and that the disruption of the democratic party in this state, to gratify his own selfish aims and ambition. The speech made by Mr. Graves on wednesday before the election, sounded the keynote to the pretentious and aims of such men as Brooks, St. John and others. These men though nominally opposed in politics, are really cheek by jowl, and the matter will be demonjust as it was about to di appear under the boat, and as good luck would have it in checking his fish which had evidently stopped when it reached shelter.

this organization must be hatlough let, the king of the expedition, measuring seventeen inches in length, but slender and not weighing over four pounds. The breaking of the rod was a catastrophe, of course, but the capture of that fish was a victory sufficiently glorious to compensate for many losses. Will was in no sense discouraged. He fished on with his five foot pole, and if he had hooked another prince of the pool would have given him "a powerful good fight." It was at this time that came in sight, and the picture of the stern of the boat, fishing for small mouthed black bass, the gamest fish of our waters, with five feet of rod a quarter of an inch in diameter. "Allee samee," as the Chimanan would say, the "Melican man" didn't give up, and after I reached him he managed in some way, though not without many a tempted the same and row as a former way though not without many a tempted the same are now more fully known than then, and we cannot believe that his following will be increased should. some way, though not without many a struggle and narrow escape from discomfiture, in making his catch from that pool number lifteen. I caught two or three on my side of the boat, and we moved on. In describing our cannot be decide to make a figure-head of himself again on the field of politics.

HOW WALLACE WROTE. tackle at the outset I stated that the pretty rod came to grief, and I have now told you the story of its disaster.

After leaving this place the cook kiled a few ducks as they flew over, and as Billy had killed a few in the morning, and one squirrel, there was material on hand for a burgoo.

The day's journey was through enchanting scenery. The mountains upon either side, sometimes upon both sides at once, were mostly precipitous, and the rocks of different strata and hues presented exquisite blendings of hues presented exquisite blendings of much the first year as the second. That hues presented exquisite bleudings of form and color. When the hills rose upon both sides of the river beautiful vistas would sometimes be formed, with the light almost shut out overhead, but appearing far in the distance. The rapids, which were frequent, sparkled and glittered, and whirled our boats-along at times as if they had been toys. We went into "Camp Atex' rather late, upon the left bank of the stream, by the side of a country road. As we were getting things into been toys. We went into "Camp Alex' rather late, upon the left bank of the stream, by the side of a country road. As we were getting things into shape an old lady passed on horse back with whom we exchanged compliments, the result of which was that after supper her son-in-law, Mr. Elias Riddle, his triend, a deputy sheriff of Puta-ki country, and two younger gentlemen called on us at our camp. Mr. Buddle is a substantial forward of the Montezumas at Sante Riddle is a substantial farmer who re-

He explained to us the modus operandi of gigging fish, when the river is low in winter, and the fish lie in the deep stretches between the rapids. At that time, the water being perfectly clear and transparent, the fish may be seen very easily, and Mr. Riddle said, it was 'no trick at all' for die said, it was 'no trick at ail' for a man who knew how to gig, as he did, to kill his sixteen or eighteen hundred pounds of fish a day. These are readi obnoxious instruments of extermina-tion, the gig and spear. whether opposed or in favor of the Wood law. This being the case, who has any right to complain? tion, the gig and spear. sheriff, surprised us a little by recog-nizing our Scraps as a dog which he had formerly owned. He said his real

He promised to take him off our hands in the morning, but a half years before the tollowing contailed to put in an armondant of the state of the ny. As Mr. Riddle departed we remembered that we had not inquired his name, so we called after him for his pa ronymic. He turned his head over his shoulder and hallooed back:

"My name is Elias Riddle—E-1-i-a-s, Elias; R-i-d-1-e, Riddle; and so he sifted away in the gloom of the forest.
